Should Marijuana Be Legalized?

In today's society, the legalization of marijuana has become a consistent and controversial discussion. The debate, however, has heightened amid the steps taken by various states to decriminalize and the possession of the drug, but for small quantities. Proponents and opponents of marijuana put forward different but valid claims which make the conundrum even tougher to find a solution. Opponents argue that marijuana plays a significant role in creating the gateway or opening the opportunities for addicts to use other drugs. Thus, it can be deduced that if the government illegalizes the drug, the fight against other illicit drugs will be easily manageable. Besides, the debate has currently influenced organized as well as medical and pharmaceutical companies to take their part in the discussion as vested interest on the drug. The debate is more intense than it appears to be. Personal interests instigate different arguments from different perspectives. For example, the pharmaceuticals could be arguing in the favor of marijuana legalization for medical gains. State government, on the other hand, could argue in the favor of the same because marijuana business would translate to lucrative revenues. Nonetheless, I propose that marijuana should be legalized because it will not only help in freeing up resources but also play an integral role in the eliminating the money-consuming enforcement meant for curbing the use of the drug.

The Parents have Role of Limited the Access to Internet for their Children

In the process of children's development, parents have the integral role they ought to play. Not only are they responsible for overseeing their children's behaviour, but also regulating and monitoring their use of the internet. In the today's society the advancements in the area of technology has made internet available to many children. Thus, many children remain at the risk of being exposed to very dangerous content such as harassment, cyber bullying or immoral content. In comparison, cases of children entering into relationships with people they have encountered on the Internet are on the rise. This numerous issues illustrate the need for parents to ensure that their children learn how to use the Internet in a constructive and safe manner. In the other hand, restricting how a child uses the Internet has the potential to weaken their capacity to be trustworthy. It is obvious that children will need to learn how to handle or monitor their online presence in order to grasp what information they need to download, post, or upload. By being concerned about how their children use the internet at home, parent get the opportunity to talk some sensitive things about the behaviour as well as how they can utilize the internet for positive experiences.

Colleges Should Make Efforts to Pay Their Athletes

The arguments from the proponents and opponents of paying college athletes are valid in equal measure. It is, therefore, to make a case of how one outweighs the other. Even so, I believe that the proponents should be accorded a higher consideration that their counterparts. Paying college athletes is a form motivation that motivate them to participate on thoroughly in training and competition. As such, they lack time for participating in criminal activities such as theft.

There is also a rational case to make that they deserve some kind of reward for the effort they have made. In the other hand, it can also be argued that the colleges provide these students with grants and various incentives during their time at these higher learning institutions, and it may therefore be argued that they have been sufficiently remunerated. In colleges where athletes are paid for their efforts, scholarship and enrolments rates are likely to increase, immensely.
